How to Grade and Rank Every Basketballer in History Arthur R. Linton 1998-11-01 The author draws on his engineering studies, site experiences, & project management techniques, to conceptualize & develop a formula to rank basketballers. Simply plug a player's statistics into the formula & calculate his or her effectiveness factor (EF) for the period during which the player accumulated those figures. This allows EFs to be calculated for any play-period: one minute, five minutes, a quarter, a game, a month, a season, or even a career. The career EFs of players of different era allow straight, unbiased, comparisons as each player's "power" or rate of building his or her statistics is what is actually compared. The results have been astonishing. We are now able to directly compare Tim Hardaway with Bob Cousy & Michael Jordan with George Mikan & Magic Johnson very accurately. Each player is ranked based on the tasks that player was able to accomplish in a minute, on average. The greatest male & female basketballers are listed & key 1998, NBA playoff games are analyzed. Readers are encouraged to use the methods presented freely & the basketball industry exhorted to establish a performance measuring standard. The whole basketball industry should benefit from this breakthrough.

Heroes of the Hardcourt Keith R. Thompson 2005-12-07 In 2006 the NBA will celebrate its 60th anniversary as a competitive league. Upon its establishment in 1946 the NBA - via its forerunner the Basketball Association of America - became the 21st professional basketball league to be formed in the U.S., and the one that would outlast all the others. In addition, since 1896 when professional basketball began in Trenton, New Jersey thousands of players have competed in a pro game, and generated countless hours of debate as to who the best players are in the history of the sport. In fact, precisely 3572 players and 439 All-stars have graced the courts of the NBA and the iconoclastic American Basketball

Association when it was in operation between 1967 and 1976, many with spectacular - and sometimes incredible - performances. And until now there has never been a truly scientific method of evaluating their performances on a basketball court, and determining who the all-time best is. Finally, after 109 years, such a measure has been created. This book, Heroes of the Hardcourt: Ranking Pro Basketball's 100 Greatest Players ranks the 100 greatest players to play professional basketball since 1946 by utilizing a scientific methodology, the Performance Efficiency Rating (PER) System, developed by the author who is a former economics professor. This is the most comprehensive measure ever devised to accurately measure basketball performance and answer the question of who is the greatest basketball player ever. The PER methodology has also proven remarkably accurate in determining the true MVP winner in the NBA for the past ten years, correctly predicting the eventual winner the majority of the time. Heroes of the Hardcourt, in addition to profiling the top 100 players - counting down from number 100 all the way to number one - also provides an historical summary of the one hundred-plus years of professional basketball in the U.S., and concludes with an analysis of the 1984 draft in which four of the best players to ever compete were drafted. It concludes that not only did the Portland Trailblazers make a poor decision in selecting Sam Bowie over Michael Jordan, but so did the Houston Rockets who also drafted Hakeem Olajuwon over MJ. A knowledge of the PER methodology, the author asserts, would have created a better draft selection then, as it clearly does now. Heroes of the Hardcourt will finally lay to rest all the debates as to who the best players are in the history of professional basketball, and who is the all-time best.
